

Honoring Trailblazers in Mental Health

Herman George Canady

Herman George Canady was distinguished Black clinical and social psychologist who made groundbreaking contributions to the field. Canady is the first psychologist to delve into the influence of rapport between an IQ test proctor and the subject. His research focused on how the race of a test proctor can introduce bias in IQ testing, highlighting the need for a more inclusive examination of intelligence.

Beyond research, Canady played a pivotal role in shaping testing environments conducive to the success of Black students. His work emphasized the importance of creating environments that reflect and support students' diverse experiences, contributing to a more equitable educational landscape.

Join us in honoring Canady's contributions to the advancement of education and psychology!
